The Doing What Works website translates research-based practices into practical tools that support & improve classroom instruction.

Educators want to know what works, based on the best available evidence. They want help implementing research-based practices. This website builds a bridge from research to action—helping educators meet the requirements of No Child Left Behind by providing concrete information about implementing research-based educational practices.

New content is regularly added to the site, <http://dww.ed.gov>. Be sure to “subscribe” to updates to stay current on the latest changes.

Content on the website is organized into three areas:

- LEARN what works
Understand the research base behind recommended practices
- SEE what works
Understand how practices are implemented in schools
- DO what works
Access tools & templates to improve practice

Coming Soon: Early Childhood Education!

Current content includes a focus on English Language Learners!

The Doing What Works website is led by the Office of Planning, Evaluation & Policy Development (OPEPD) at the U.S. Department of Education. Doing What Works relies primarily on the Institute of Education Sciences at the U.S. Department of Education to evaluate and recommend practices that are supported by rigorous research. Then, Doing What Works provides examples of possible ways educators might apply those research findings, but these are not necessarily the only ways to carry out these teaching practices. The examples provided on the Doing What Works website – including any product names contained in school materials – should not be construed as an endorsement by the U.S. Department of Education of any products, programs, or curricula.
